PREFACE.

I.

The period included in the seventh volume ended with the sudden rise of the Boyd family to the highest power in the state towards the close of the minority of James III. The present volume continues the Exchequer accounts down to the audit of 1479. Except for the years 1470 and 1472, which are a blank, we have a complete series of the accounts of the administrators of the Crown lands, and of the custumars and bailies of the burghs; and in 1471 the accounts of the Sheriffs have also been preserved. The accounts of 1471 present the peculiarity of being written in a book instead of in rolls, a form so much more convenient, that it seems difficult to understand why, when once adopted, it should again have been discontinued.

Of this middle period of the reign of James III. the events first calling for notice are the marriage of the King with a Danish Princess, and the acquisition through that marriage of Orkney and Shetland.

The considerations involved in the latter event carry us back to the reign of Alexander III. By the treaty of 1266 which followed on the unsuccessful raid on Scotland by Hakon Hakonson of Norway, and the death of that monarch at Kirkwall, Man and all the Western Islands were surrendered to Scotland, in consideration of an immediate payment of 4000 marks and an annual tribute of 100 marks, Norway permanently retaining Orkney and Shetland. Though this treaty had been renewed by Robert I. in 1312, and continued to be held binding, the small money rent stipulated had been but irregularly paid. In March 1368–9, in reply to a demand by Hakon VII. for the "annual" with arrears, a letter was written craving delay till the ransom of David II. should be paid, and adverting to the fact that the islands for which the yearly tribute was due had in part passed into the hands of the English.[1] The Exchequer accounts of 1426 allude to the arrival in Scotland of a herald of the King of Norway to arrange about this matter.[2] But his mission was fruitless; the annual went on accumulating: and, after a peremptory but equally inoperative remonstrance with James II., we find King Christiern of Denmark in 1457 requesting the friendly intervention of the French King, with whom he had the year before entered into a treaty. Charles VII. threw out the happy suggestion of a matrimonial adjustment of the national quarrel: and negotiations for this end, which were progressing at Paris, were arrested by the news of the death of James II.

While the non-payment of the yearly tribute for the Hebrides had thus been a long standing source of irritation in Norway, the condition of the isolated dependency of the Scandinavian Crown which so nearly adjoined the mainland of Scotland was far from satisfactory to either country. On their conquest or colonization in the 9th century, the Orkneys (including Shetland) had been placed under the rule of a Norse Jarl, whose successors, proceeding to subdue and occupy Caithness, possessed Scotland north of the Moray Firth as an integral part of their domains, held, equally with Orkney, of the Kings of Norway. Nor had these Jarls to abandon their mainland possessions with the re-establishment of the Scottish sovereignty in Caithness: they only became vassals of the King of Scotland as Earls of Caithness, while continuing to hold Orkney of the Crown of Norway. The earldoms of Orkney and Caithness (both of them however being repeatedly subdivided) passed in time by female succession, first to a younger branch of the Scottish comital house of Angus, and then, in or shortly before 1329, to the last of a succession of Earls of Strathern who bore the name of Malise; the divided allegiance of these magnates becoming, as time advanced, more and more a source of weakness to Norway.

But Earl Malise of Strathern, Caithness, and Orkney, though twice married, had female issue only. He seems to have forfeited the Strathern earldom through an act of feudal disobedience in 1334; and in 1376 the earldom of Caithness came to an end by Alexander of Arde, his grandson by his eldest daughter, and his heir in that dignity, resigning it into the hands of Robert II.[1] These acts of course did not affect the earldom of Orkney. On the death of Malise, which occurred in or before 1353, Erngisl Suneson, husband of a younger daughter of Malise, was at first allowed to design himself Earl of Orkney.[2] But in 1357 he fell into disgrace and lost his titles and estates. Competing claims were then laid before the King of Norway by the representatives of Malise's different daughters; and the preference was eventually given to Henry Sinclair of Rosslyn, son of his second daughter Isabel or Elizabeth.[3] Investiture

[3] She was the eldest daughter of Malise's second wife, Marjory, daughter of Hugh Earl of Ross, King Robert Bruce's brother-in-law. Matilda, the only daughter, (so far as appears) of Malise's former marriage, was mother of Alexander of Arde, who, as has been stated, resigned the earldom of Caithness to the Scottish Crown in 1376, and who was allowed temporary possession of Orkney as viceroy for a year in 1375 (Diplomatarium Norvegicum, ii. pp. 337–9). Mr Skene is disposed to connect the disregard of Matilda's rights with the complicity of her mother in the Soulis conspiracy (Celtic Scotland, iii. p. 453). Erngisl Suneson has been mentioned: and another claimant, Malise Sperra, son of another daughter of Earl Malise who had married a Swedish nobleman, was afterwards (1389) slain in an attempt to wrest Shetland from Earl Henry. He seems to be the "Malisius Speir, miles," referred to in the Exchequer Rolls of 1438, as having owned lands in the sheriffdom of Banff (vol. v. page 54).

As to the question whether Henry Sinclair was son or husband of Malise's daughter, see Appendix to Preface No. I.

was given him by Haco VII. in 1379, but burdened with various restrictive conditions, including an acknowledgment that he held of the King's absolute grace, feudal services of a very rigorous kind, and a prohibition to erect forts on any of the islands.[1] If the Norse allegiance sat somewhat lightly on him, this was still more the case with his son and successor bearing the same name, the Admiral of Scotland, whose wife was Egidia Douglas, heiress of Nithsdale and granddaughter of Robert II. On the death of the second Earl Henry, which seems to have occurred about 1417, his son Sir William Sinclair of Rosslyn, though in Scotland he assumed the title of Earl of Orkney,[2] was for a length of time superseded in the Orkneys by commissioners or viceroys appointed by King Eric, one of whom was Thomas Tulloch, Bishop of Orkney.[3] It was not till 1434 that he received formal investiture, and that under restrictions similar to those imposed on his grandfather. He is best known as the founder of the Collegiate Church of Rosslyn; and, besides being, like his father, Admiral of Scotland, he held the higher post of Chancellor. James II. made him Earl of Caithness; and some time before

[1] This last restriction he seems to have violated in building Kirkwall Castle.

[2] We find him so designed as instrumentary witness to charters on 4th February and 8th March 1424–5, and on 6th October 1429 (Reg. Mag. Sig., l. ii. Nos. 3, 6, 18, 19; l. iii. No. 46).

the 28th June 1461, the Estates appointed him one of the guardians of James III., as we learn from a letter of that date to King Christiern from William Tulloch, Bishop of Orkney.[1] This letter, and an earlier manifesto of the bailies of Kirkwall and community of Orkney,[2] inform us that the Orkneys were at that time habitually overrun by bands of Islesmen and Highlanders sent thither in ships by the Earl of Ross, designed as "ab antiquo inimicus capitalis," who burned, plundered, and ravaged the country, massacred the inhabitants without respect to age or sex, and carried off whatever cattle or other property they could lay hands on. These invasions must have been of yearly occurrence before the death of James II.[3] Bishop William Tulloch, in the letter here alluded to, excuses the Earl for his remissness in not having proceeded to the Danish court on the twofold ground of his duties as guardian of the Scottish King, and the effort which he was then making to come to an arrangement with the Lord of the Isles to put a stop to [1] Diplomatarium Norvegicum, x. p. 606. The appointment was probably made at the first Parliament of James III., of which no records have been preserved. There seems, nevertheless, no reason to doubt the assertion of the Asloan MS. (quoted Preface to vol. vii. page 39) that the Queen Dowager obtained the charge of the King's person and education, to the dissatisfaction of the "Old Lords." While Lesly and Buchanan both assert that certain regents or guardians of the King were appointed, but differ as to who they were, each mentions the Earl of Orkney as one of them.

these periodical marauding expeditions, causes which even prevented his presence in Orkney.[1] The result of these negotiations with the island chief does not appear; but it would seem that the Earl's conduct a few years later was regarded by King Christiern as far from satisfactory; and one of his sons had, on grounds unknown to us, seized and detained in prison the prelate who in 1461 had been the apologist for his remissness in the performance of his feudal obligations.

The death of James II. had only temporarily interrupted the negotiations in Paris to which allusion has been made. In a meeting of the Estates held in Edinburgh Castle under the auspices of the Boyds in 1466, the "annuale of Norwaye" and the marriage of the young King were among the subjects discussed.[2] We learn from Torfæus[3] that in 1467 King Christiern wrote to the King of Scots remonstrating against the imprisonment of Bishop Tulloch, requesting James to use his influence for his liberation, and intimating his determination to adopt such measures as would put a stop for the future to the oppressions practised by the Earl of Orkney on the subjects of the Danish Crown. At the Parliament held at Stirling in January 1467-68, it was resolved to despatch an embassy without delay to Denmark to treat of the marriage of the King with a convenient person of noble blood, and with full power to conclude the transaction and bring home the royal bride. £3000 were to be raised for the expense of this mission, £1000 from the clergy, £1000 from the barons, and £1000 from the burgesses.[1] The ambassadors sent were Lord Avandale, the Bishop of Glasgow, the Bishop of Orkney (now released from durance, taken under the protection of the Scottish government, and soon to be made keeper of the Privy Seal), the Earl of Arran, Martin Wan, the King's confessor, Archdeacon Rerik of Glasgow, David Crichton of Cranstoun,[2] and John Schaw of Haly. They were eminently successful in achieving the objects of their mission. King Christiern agreed to bestow his daughter Margaret on James; and, in addition to a full discharge of the annual and its arrears, her portion was to consist of 60,000 florins Rhenish, 10,000 to be paid before the Princess left Copenhagen, and Orkney to be pledged for the rest, while James was to secure his consort in the Palace of Linlithgow and Castle of Doune as jointure lands, and a third of the royal revenue was to be settled on her in case of her survivance.[3] The marriage contract embodying these conditions was signed in duplicate on 8th September 1468. Torfæus prints it, apparently from an early copy of the Danish duplicate, the original of which is understood to be no longer extant. The Scottish duplicate has been preserved in the Register House, though not in very perfect condition; and, as there are a few slight discrepancies between it and Torfæus's version, it is inserted in the Appendix to this Preface, with the gaps supplied within brackets from Torfæus.[1]

Arran set out homewards to obtain further instructions from James, and returned in Spring to Copenhagen to rejoin his brother envoys, and with them to convey the bride to Scotland. But the financial resources of Denmark were then so low that it was found impossible to raise more than one fifth of the stipulated 10,000 florins; and the result was the further impignoration of the Shetland Islands for 8000 florins, a transaction regarding which there seems to be no legal instrument extant. Owing to the non-payment of the money secured on these two groups of islands, they have come permanently to be accounted part of Scotland; though it has from time to time been made matter of curious speculation whether Norway might yet recover them on payment of the 58,000 florins of redemption money. In the transaction regarding Orkney at least, there is no specified limitation of time for the redemption of the pledge.

[1] See infra, page lxxvii. The seals of King Christiern and of all the above named Scottish commissioners had been originally appended to this document; but that of Wan, the Chancellor of the diocese of Glasgow and King's almoner and confessor, is alone preserved. Its legend is imperfect, the words "cancellarii Glasguensis" being legible; and the arms are a bend engrailed. In the Chartulary of Glasgow there are some notes by Father Innes regarding seals appended to some of the documents engrossed in that collection. Among them is a memorandum of a seal of the same Martin Wan, appended to the confirmation of a grant of a chaplainry by him in 1496 (ii. p. 23). It is described as "exhibens super scuto tres rosas impositas tenie striate a dextris oblique," or, in vernacular phraseology, a bend engrailed charged with three roses. In Wan's seal attached to the royal marriage contract, although the impression is tolerably sharp, the editor can discern no trace of the roses.

On the completion of these arrangements the Scottish ambassadors set sail from Copenhagen with the royal bride, accompanied by a train of Danish nobles; and, on their arrival in Scotland in the month of July 1469, the wedding was celebrated at Holyrood with great pomp, the bridegroom and bride being respectively in their eighteenth and twelfth years. The Queen's coronation took place in November following. The Exchequer accounts of the audit immediately following the marriage and coronation, that of 1470, are wanting; and we have therefore no entries directly connected with either event.

Torfæus's mention, in connexion with James's marriage, of the restoration to royal favour at King Christiern's intercession of Sir John Ross of Halkhead, who had fallen into temporary disgrace,[1] receives a certain measure of incidental corroboration from the rolls. Ross had first achieved distinction as one of the combatants in the tournament held on 25th February 1448–49 in the presence of James II. between two knights and an esquire of Scotland and the same of Burgundy.[1] He was made Sheriff of Linlithgow in succession to Archibald Dundas of that Ilk; and his account as Sheriff, rendered in June 1471, seems to show that he was superseded in that office by Henry Livingston in 1468, and restored to it again on 3rd August 1469.[2] From 1463 to 1468 inclusive he is found in the enjoyment of an annuity from the customs of Linlithgow or Edinburgh, as keeper of Blackness Castle.[3] His pension does not occur in the accounts of 1469 and immediately succeeding years; but in 1474 his salary as keeper of Blackness begins again to be regularly paid from the fermes of Bonnington and Blackness.[4]

Synchronous with the royal wedding was the fall of the Boyd family. The enemies of the Earl of Arran had in his absence convinced James that the seizure of his royal person in 1466 ought to be regarded as an act of treason. The trial and conviction of the Boyds took place in the same November with the Queen's coronation. Arran, informed of what was in contemplation before setting foot on land, had made a precipitate retreat to Denmark, accompanied by his wife the Princess.

Lord Boyd, after an abortive attempt at armed resistance, escaped to England; and decree of attainder was pronounced in absence against both. Sir Alexander Boyd, the King's quondam instructor in chivalrous exercises, less fortunate than his brother and nephew, suffered decapitation.

The same Parliament of November 1469 in which the Boyds were forfeited annexed certain lands inalienably to the Principality. Besides Bute, Cowal, Dundonald, and Renfrew, these included all the lands—Arran excepted—which the Earl of Arran had obtained as dowry with the Princess, also Kilmarnock and the other Boyd estates, including Sir Alexander Boyd's lands of Drumcoll.[1] Kilmarnock was, however, a few months later, granted to the Queen for life.[2]

The accounts of 1471 contain various references to lands, rights, and offices possessed by the Boyds during their brief period of exaltation. The rents of Teling in Forfarshire and Polgavy in Perthshire, with an annuity from Brichty, which, on his father's resignation, had been conferred on the Earl of Arran, are accounted for as forfeited by Lord Boyd's attainder.[3] Lord Boyd had by permission, it is said, of the late Queen and Council, enjoyed an annuity from Stewartoun, with twelve yearly payments of which, amounting in all to £320, the serjeant of

Stewartoun was allowed to credit himself.[1] Allusion is made to various unwarranted intromissions with the Crown rents at the instance of Lord Boyd.[2] The Sheriff of Dumfries notes that the vassals of Drumcoll had received sasine from the Crown, in place of from Sir Alexander Boyd, in consequence of the attainder of the latter.[3] The Sheriffs' accounts further indicate that the offices of profit held by Arran included the sheriffdom of Wigtoun[4] and the stewartry of Kirkcudbright,[5] and that the island of Arran had also been temporarily erected into a sheriffdom, which had been conferred on him.[6]

Janet Maxwell, wife of Lord Boyd, and Janet Kennedy, widow of Sir Alexander Boyd, have each an annuity of £20 in the Stewartoun account of 1471; but in the next extant account, that of 1474, which goes back two years, Sir Alexander's widow no longer appears, and Lord Boyd's wife receives payment only for the first term.[7]

About a year after their marriage we find the King and Queen making a journey northwards as far as Inverness, where they remained from 23rd July to 24th August 1470, and had oats, barley, and marts supplied by the Chamberlain of Moray,[1] and other furnishings by the custumars of Inverness.[2] Aberdeen, Fyvie, Banff, and Wrangham in the Garioch, are specified by the chamberlain of Mar (Alexander Lesly of Wardes) as stages in Queen Margaret's progress.[3]

The newly acquired islands naturally claimed the early attention of the Crown. The divided allegiance of the Earls of Orkney might yet revive were the islands to be redeemed by Denmark : and such a contingency may not have been considered impossible either by James III. or by the Earl. It is probable that the Earl of Orkney, who was also Earl of Caithness, and whose principal interests lay, as has been seen, in Scotland, considered it quite an advantageous bargain when, resigning the island earldom, he received in compensation the conveniently lying lands of Ravensheugh and Dysart, and the noble castle which Mary of Gueldres had erected in her widowhood, along with a pension of 400 marks to be paid from the customs of Edinburgh. King Christiern as well as King James became a party to the transaction, granting the Earl a discharge of all claims which might be made on him at any future time by the Danish Crown.[4] From this time the pension of £266, 13s. 4d. to " William Earl of Caithness and

Lord Sinclair" appears regularly in the Edinburgh accounts;[1] and it will be remarked that in 1479, in which year Sinclair had divested himself of the earldom of Caithness in favour of his younger son, he is called simply Lord Sinclair.[2] So also in an

[1] Pages 120, 190, 191, 253, 312, 390, 466, 546.

[2] Page 630. He was a lord of Parliament as Lord Sinclair as far back as 1449; and the use of that title by him, and by his grandson by his eldest son, in a document of 1487 (printed from the original in the Udny charter-chest in the Antiquities of Shires of Aberdeen and Banff, Spalding Club, iii. p. 103), sufficiently disproves the contention that he had divested himself of it along with the earldom of Caithness, and that when Parliament in 1488 declared that the grandson was rightful heir to the dignity belonging to his grandfather and lands connected with it "after the form of the charters and evidents made thereupon," it conferred on him a new title of honour. It follows therefore that when the charter of 1677 confirmed the title of Lord Sinclair to a new series of heirs with the old precedence, the precedence of the dignity granted by James II. must have been meant. It is not meant here to indicate any opinion on the further question, raised by Mr Riddell (Peerage Law, p. 55), whether, in the absence of any mention of a resignation in the Crown charter, it can be presumed that the original dignity was transferred to the new heirs, and whether it may not still have a separate existence in the person of the heir of line or heir male of the original family.

A certain William Sinclair is said, in the Mar account of 1456, to have taken by violence 350 demys gold from William Seton of Echt, on the pretext of a transaction between Sir Alexander Seton of Gordon and the Earl of Orkney about the terce to which that Earl's first Countess had a right from the earldom of Mar (vol. vi. page 268). There seems every reason to believe that this William, as well as the son of the Earl of Orkney of whom King Christiern complained as having imprisoned the Bishop of Orkney (Torfæus, p. 187), was "William the Waster," only son of the Earl by his first wife the Countess of Buchan, whom, in consideration of his reckless and prodigal character, his father considered it necessary to pass over in the succession to the earldom of Caithness in favour of the son of his second marriage, also named William (Reg. Mag. Sig., lvii. No. 393, 7 Dec. 1476). In a later age it came to be keenly contested whether the ex-Earl of Orkney had not also passed over an elder son of the second marriage, namely, Oliver Sinclair of Rosslyn, or whether Oliver was junior to the younger William. A contract between the elder William and Oliver in the Pencaitland charter-chest, quoted and founded on by Mr entry in the audit of 1480, which fixes the date of his death as between Martinmas 1479 and Whitsunday 1480.[1]

In February 1471-2 Parliament annexed Orkney and Shetland to the Crown, not to be dissevered from it except in favour of legitimate royal issue :[2] and from that time we have a series of accounts of Orkney and Shetland. Bishop William Tulloch entered in August 1472 on a lease of both groups of islands at a rent of £120, fifty chalders of barley, and six score marts, computed at first at £466, 13s. 4d., as an equivalent in money.[3] That prelate, whose accounts begin to be rendered in 1474, continued lessee for three years after his transference to the see of Moray, which took place in 1476. On 28th April 1478, his successor in the see of Orkney had a lease of Orkney and Shetland, with the custody of Kirkwall

Riddell (Peerage Law, p. 609), in which the Earl of Caithness is called "his younger brother," does not seem conclusively to settle the point, as, the word "his" in the connection in which it stands may mean either Oliver's or the elder William's younger brother. It may be remarked on the other hand that the armorial evidence, which is not unimportant, tells against Oliver. Oliver's grandson, Sir William Sinclair of Rosslyn was contemporary with the famous Lyon, Sir David Lindsay ; and the fact that in the arms of "Sinclair of Roslyn" in Sir David's Register the engrailed cross is charged with a mullet, the difference of a third son, seems almost decisive of Sir Oliver's juniority. The mark of cadency was afterwards dropped, probably in consequence of Lord Sinclair and the Earl of Caithness both having their arms otherwise differenced.

[3] The marts being reckoned at a mark each, and the chalder of barley at 8 marks (page 225). But after the first three years the chalder was computed at 5 marks, which made the whole rent only £366, 13s. 4d (pages 453, 483, 614).

Castle and other fortresses in these islands from 3rd May following during the King's pleasure, and on terms the same as those of the lease of the Bishop of Moray, which was by the same instrument revoked.[1] The accounts begin in 1479 to be rendered by Andrew Bishop of Orkney, in conjunction sometimes with Henry Sinclair, grandson by his eldest son of the Earl of Orkney, and afterwards Lord Sinclair.

The Orkneys were in repute as a breeding place for hawks: and one use to which the new acquisition was put is indicated by the continual recurrence in the Orkney accounts of disbursements to the King's falconers, sent to obtain falcons for James.[2] In 1476 the "lawman" or chief magistrate gets a fee of £48 for the four preceding years, which is ordered not to be paid again without express mandate.[3] The depredations of the Lord of the Isles had probably ceased before Orkney came into possession of the Scottish Crown: but the accounts, soon after the date of this volume, inform us of Shetland being robbed and plundered by the Lords of Norway and their people ("per dominos Norowegie et commissarios eorundem"), to an extent that was considered to warrant an abatement of rent of £64 in the account of 1484.[4] and it has been questioned whether the Princess Mary was a widow or a divorced wife when she married Lord Hamilton. Ferrerius, in a passage where there is a little confusion between father and son, makes Arran find his way first to England, then to Germany, Venice, Rome, and Naples, and eventually meet his death at the hands of an injured husband at Florence.[1] According to the more probable narrative of Buchanan, after first betaking himself to the Court of Denmark, he wandered to Germany and France, and died at Antwerp in the service of Charles the Bold of Burgundy, who erected a sumptuous monument to his memory.[2] Boyd undoubtedly lived long enough with the Princess for two children to be born of the marriage, whose history is well known. Ferrerius, Lesly, and Buchanan all concur in asserting that the Princess was in Arran's lifetime induced by her father to return to Scotland, and that the King contrived to have her marriage annulled by divorce, according to Buchanan, on the ground of non-adherence (not, it may be remarked, in those days a sufficient ground for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii), according to Ferrerius on the then usual plea of some original canonical impediment.[3] Bellenden, on the other hand, who was almost a contemporary, without adverting to a divorce, distinctly asserts that the marriage with Lord Hamilton took place after Boyd's death.[1] An often quoted letter of the Paston series, addressed by Sir John Paston to his brother also named John, and dated 15th June without mention of year, refers to Arran as then in England.[2] Sir John Fenn supplies the year conjecturally as either 1470 or 1472. Mr Gairdner, guided by certain local allusions, regards the letter as certainly of 1472. If he be right in this, it must follow that there existed a mistaken belief in Arran's death in Scotland the year previously, as, in the account of the Steward of Kirkcudbright rendered in July 1471, he is called "quondam Thomas Boyd comes de Arane."[3] The rolls further show that the Princess was in Scotland at Martinmas 1472, when she received the whole fermes of Bothwell for that term by the King's order,[4] and that cloth was furnished to her by the custumars of Edinburgh sometime between 1st March 1472–3 and 26th June 1473.[1] That her marriage to Lord Hamilton occurred prior to 12th July 1474 appears from a charter granted of that date to James Lord Hamilton and Mary Stewart his wife the King's sister.[2] If there was a divorce, it may have been that Arran's death occurred in the interval between the divorce and remarriage, in which case Bellenden's statement would still be correct. If Charles the Bold erected a monument to his memory, Arran must have been dead some time before January 1476–7, when Charles himself was killed.

The history of the Earl of Arran after his precipitate retreat from Scotland is somewhat obscure;

Lord Hamilton's former wife and the Princess were related to each other within the prohibited degrees: and it was not till the 25th April 1476, by which time two children had been born of the marriage, that this canonical bar (as well as others arising from illicit intercourse with ladies related to the Princess) was removed by papal dispensation.[3] The dispensation legitimated the children already born in respect of the ignorance of the mother (though not the father) of the relationship. Hamilton's former wife, Euphemia Graham, and the Princess are described as related in the third and fourth degree, the relationship being obviously as follows:—

An heir to the throne, the future James IV., was born on 17th March 1472–3.[1] A few months later the Queen set out on a pilgrimage to the famous shrine of St Ninian in Galloway, for the expenses of which there is an entry in the Galloway account of 1474.[2]

In 1472 the bishopric of St Andrews was erected by a Bull of Pope Sixtus IV. into a metropolitan see.[3] The Bull had been granted on the suit of Bishop Kennedy's successor and uterine brother, Patrick Graham, who at the same time received a commission as apostolic Nuncio to levy subsidies for a crusade against the Turks. While this ecclesiastical change was not unnaturally looked on with disfavour in England and in Norway, inasmuch as it involved the withdrawal of the sees of Galloway and Orkney from the Archbishops of York and Trondhjem respectively, it provoked quite a storm of opposition from the Scottish Bishops, who had formerly acknowledged no superior but the Pope. They enlisted the King on their side; and the Archbishop had to undergo an obstinate persecution, which is said eventually to have affected his reason. It has been suggested that pronounced church-reforming tendencies on the part of the new Metropolitan may in part account for the attitude of the mass of the clergy towards him. Thomas Spens, Bishop of Aberdeen, succeeded in obtaining a Bull of date 14th February 1473–4, exempting that see during his lifetime from the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan.[1] A papal Nuncio, sent to Scotland at the request of the King and Clergy, found the Archbishop to have committed grave ecclesiastical offences, in consideration of which he was deposed and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment; and he ended his days in Lochleven Castle. The Treasurers' accounts contain numerous allusions to the proceedings against Graham.[2] The chief deviser of his ruin seems to have been Dr William Scheves, afterwards his successor as Archbishop, whose career was a somewhat singular one. A relation probably of John Scheves, canon of Glasgow and Aberdeen in the two previous reigns, and Clerk Register under James I.,[1] he had, according to Buchanan, studied medicine and astrology at Louvain under a famous master of the latter art.[2] His proficiency in astrology was a passport to the favour of the King, himself a devotee of the occult sciences: and in 1471, 1473, and 1474, we find him getting a salary of £20 from the customs of Edinburgh as King's physician,[3] besides oats from Fife for his horses.[4] He had also some official connection with the royal Wardrobe.[5] Buchanan relates that he was presented to the archdeaconry of St Andrews by James, but refused institution by Graham on the plea of his devotion to unlawful arts. The King supported his favourite against his near kinsman; the Rector of the University took the same side: and this incident seems to have brought to a climax the clerical disaffection towards the Archbishop. As Archdeacon of St Andrews, Scheves was Exchequer auditor in 1475 and 1476;[6] we find him, also designed Archdeacon, buying spices and medicines in the Treasurer's accounts for 1473–4; and in the Moneyer's account of 1476 the King's receipts, amounting to £56, 8s. 4d., are handed over to him.[1] Before the arrival of the Nuncio whose mission it was to sit in judgment on the Metropolitan, Scheves had been appointed coadjutor to Graham. He is so designed as auditor of Exchequer in 1477,[2] and in the following year, after Graham's deposition, we find him Archbishop elect and confirmed.[3]

In the Parliament which assembled at Edinburgh in May 1474 it was determined that embassies should be sent both to Denmark and to England.[4] Edward IV., with the motive of detaching Scotland from the French interest, had proposed the cementing of a lasting peace between England and Scotland by a marriage between his youngest daughter Cecilia and the Scottish prince, the former aged four years, the latter a year and a half. On the 15th June 1474 James granted a commission to Thomas Spens, Bishop of Aberdeen, Sir John Colquhoun of Luss, James Schaw of Sauchy, and Lyon King of Arms, to have a meeting with the English commissioners on the subject; and on the 29th July following the representatives of England, who included the Bishops of Durham and Carlisle and Lord Scrope, were authorized to proceed to Edinburgh, and there conclude a treaty of marriage and alliance.[1] In the Aberdeen customs' accounts of 1476 and 1477 are remissions of custom of salmon to the Bishop of Aberdeen to the extent of £28, 16s., in consideration of his being "in ambassiata domini regis;"[2] and in the Treasurer's account of 1474 Lyon gets £20 for his expenses "passande in Inglande in the commissione with the ambaxiatouris."[3] The last named record also tells us that Unicorn pursuivant proceeded to London with a safe conduct to the English ambassadors, and that a courier was sent to the Bishop of Dunkeld "to mak his innys be abelyet (i.e., put in order) for the ambaxatouris."[4] Five chalders of wheat and three of malt were sent from Fife to Edinburgh for their expenses, and carried to the Dominican convent there. The Fife account contains a payment in money of £100 to Thomas Yare, the King's Steward, for their behoof, besides supplies in grain and malt;[5] the Galloway account of the same year has also a disbursement for them of £100;[6] and the customs' accounts further indicate that during a night's stay in Haddington their expenses amounted to £18.[7] At the departure of the embassy a gown of cloth of gold was given to the herald in their company, the satin lining of which cost £6, 15s.[1] On the 18th October 1474 the formal betrothal took place, the Earl of Crawford being proxy for the Prince, and Lord Scrope for the Princess;[2] and on the 26th October, also at Edinburgh, the treaty of marriage was signed by the commissioners of the two kingdoms, in the form of two indentures setting forth in detail the conditions of the marriage, and including also the renewal of a truce till 1519 which had been concluded two years previously. Its stipulations included a dowry of 20,000 marks English to be granted by Edward, payable in yearly instalments for the first three years of 2000, and afterwards of 1000 marks; and it set forth the exact form in which the ratifications by Edward and James were to be granted under the Great Seals of England and Scotland respectively.[3]

this entry occurs; but there can be no doubt that this is the embassy meant, and that the claim had been an outstanding one. The only other English embassy soon after that alluded to, was one that concerned a trifling misunderstanding about a "fishgarth" on the Esk, whose date is also outside the period of this account (Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. p. 450; Armstrong's History of Liddesdale, i. p. 171): but in a less important mission than one about a royal betrothal, it is unlikely that one night's expenses by the way could have come up to so large a sum.

Edward's ratification under the stipulated form (Fœdera, xi. 828; Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. 447), is also in the Register House, and bears date Westminster, 26th November 1474. James' ratification is not now to be found in the Scottish Great Seal Register, owing apparently to imperfection of the record at that date.

The English embassy was charged with another matter as well as the espousals, namely the redress of an international outrage of which the Scots had made complaint. The famous barge built by Bishop Kennedy had been wrecked near Bamborough, on a voyage southwards, freighted with merchandise belonging to the see of St Andrews, when the Abbot of St Colm, who was on board, was captured by the English and detained till he should pay a ransom. As a solatium for this breach of truce, the King of England agreed to pay 500 marks, reserving the right of the Scots to sue before the English Courts for further compensation.[1]

It will be observed that at this and other times, not nobles and prelates merely, but the King himself, engaged in mercantile adventures. During the period of the present volume, the King's hides were sent to France and Flanders for wine,[2] his ships sent to France and Denmark;[3] his woollen cloth exported for saltpetre and for wine;[4] and his merchandise sent to France.[5] The armed merchantmen belonging to the King were employed by turn in trade, in war, and in missions to foreign states. In the Fife account of 1474, supplies of wheat are furnished to the King's ships sent to France and Denmark on the King's affairs, and also to John Bertoune, "magistro carvalis domini regis;"[1] one of the two Bartons whose naval prowess became famous in the next reign. The former entry perhaps refers to a voyage of the "Yellow Carvel" to France, in which that ship had been captured by a vessel of the Duke of Gloucester called the "Mayflower." In 1474 Edward IV. sent his almoner De Legh to give redress to the Scottish Admiral (the Duke of Albany) for the misadventure, and also for the capture by Lord Grey of a ship belonging to the laird of Luss.[2]

Ferrerius refers to an outbreak of pestilence in Scotland, which led the King to adjourn the meeting of the Estates from September 1475 to Epiphany following.[3] The Parliament actually met in November, as its records bear;[4] but the occurrence of the pestilence that year is corroborated by the Orkney account at the audit following, which bears that a plague hospital had then, as on some other occasions, been established on Inchkeith, to which island ten marts were sent from Orkney to the patients.[5] According to Ferrerius and Lesly, the malady was so severe at Leith that that seaport was temporarily deserted by its inhabitants; and in the account alluded to the Bishop of Orkney is allowed the price of forty-six marts sent by him to the King's larder at Leith, which had perished "propter longam moram"—had been probably left neglected in the plague-stricken town, the King's storekeeper having either died or deserted his post.

The first three instalments of the Princess Cecilia's dowry were paid, on 3rd February 1474–5, 3rd February 1475–6, and 3rd February 1476–7.[1] The Parliament which met in November 1475 had advised that the King and Council should arrange a marriage for the King's remaining sister, the Lady Margaret;[2] and in 1477 James proposed to the King of England that the ties between the two realms should be drawn closer by two royal weddings, one between Lady Margaret, sister of the King of Scots, and the Duke of Clarence, the other between the Duke of Albany, brother of the King of Scots, and Edward's sister the Duchess of Burgundy. Edward waived the proposals on the ground of the recent widowhood of his sister;[3] but the fact was that the English King's most cogent motive for cultivating James's friendship, namely the wish to detach Scotland from the French interest, had ceased to operate since the Treaty of Pequigny had established good relations between him and Louis.

The Princess Margaret, the younger of the two daughters of James II., who cannot have been born much before her father's death, was then about seventeen. There is a continuous series of entries connected with her in the Exchequer accounts, extending from her childhood down to this date. In the accounts of 1462 and 1463 are found the fee of Mariot Darrauch her nurse,[1] her expenses at Stirling and Falkland, and clothing for her.[2] In 1464 she is sent for education to the Cistercian Convent at Haddington, where, down to 1477, twenty marks are paid yearly for her board.[3] In 1475 and onwards to 1480 there appears in the Haddington account a yearly payment of five marks to Alice or Elizabeth Maitland, one of the nuns of the Convent alluded to, designed servant (or after 1476 "lately servant") to Lady Margaret.[4]

The project for Lady Margaret's marriage with the Duke of Clarence seems never to have been seriously entertained in England: but a proposal made in March 1478–9 that she should become the wife of Anthony Lord Rivers (brother of Edward IV.'s Queen) met with more favour; and, when renewed after a brief period of hostility with England, was so near accomplishment that the Princess had (in August 1482) a safe conduct from Edward to come to England for her marriage.[1] The espousals were very probably broken off from rumours to the prejudice of the Princess reaching England; for it must have been about this time that she became the mother of an illegitimate daughter, whose father was William third Lord Crichton.[2]

Of the disturbers of the peace in the beginning of the reign of James III. the most prominent was John Earl of Ross and Lord of the Isles. His lawless acts had culminated in open rebellion in 1463: but James was either reluctant or powerless to inflict punishment on him; and for twelve years following he was allowed to retain unmolested possession of his vast estates. With the sufferance of the Crown he was keeper of Urquhart Castle, appropriating the rents of Urquhart and Glenmoriston as his fee:[3] and if he did not come to Parliament himself, he year by year empowered some one to represent him.[1] Yet he was still a thorn in the side of Government. His feuds with the Earl of Huntly were the theme of remonstrance in March 1473–4, when letters were sent to both Earls "for stanching of the slachteris and herschippis committit betwix thare folkis."[2] In 1474 mention is made of a courier of the Earl of Ross bringing letters to the King.[3] It may have been that the friendly intercourse between the King of Scots and Edward IV. led to the discovery of the island lord's till then unknown treasonable practices with England in 1462; or perhaps the increased power which the possession of the Orkneys gave to James in these northern parts emboldened him at last to bring his rebellious subject to justice. On the 16th October 1475 he was cited by Unicorn pursuivant at his Castle of Dingwall to answer for his treasonable acts before the Parliament to be held at Edinburgh on 1st December following. On his non-appearance he was declared to be guilty of treason, and to have forfeited his life, offices, and possessions to the Crown; and decree of attainder was pronounced against him.[4] The crimes for which he was thus tardily brought to justice were his treaty with England and the Earl of Douglas in 1462, his overt rebellion in 1463, and his armed invasion of Bute, apparently a transaction of 1453.

Nor was this sentence a brutum fulmen. On 4th December 1475 a commission was granted to Colin Earl of Argyll to prosecute the decree of forfeiture, with power to invade the territories of John of the Isles with fire and sword, and pursue him and his accomplices to the death.[1] An expedition was at the same time fitted out against Ross under the command of the Earls of Crawford and Athole, and he was induced by Athole to place himself at the mercy of the Crown, a service for which Lesly tells us that the King granted Athole the lands and forest of Cluny.[2]

On 15th July 1476 "John of Ile" appeared in person before the Parliament at Edinburgh in an attitude of humble submission, and, at the Queen's intercession, his possessions were restored to him, with the exception of Knapdale, Kintyre, the castles of Inverness and Nairn, and the earldom of Ross.[3] He was made a Lord of Parliament by the title of Lord of the Isles, the charter by which both dignity and estates were conferred containing remainders, failing lawful male issue, to two natural sons and their issue male.[1]

While the earldom of Ross was permanently annexed to the Crown, power was reserved to the King and his successors to bestow it on their sons; and Elizabeth Countess of Ross, a daughter of the Lord Livingston of the former reign, was, in consideration of her non-participancy in her husband's rebellion, and loyal services to the late King and Queen, secured in the liferent of certain lands in Ross in which she had been infeft jointly with her husband before his forfeiture, with an additional £100 from lands and revenues of the earldom, a grant confirmed by the King on his attaining the age of twenty-five.[2]

A series of accounts of the earldom of Ross begin in 1479, rendered at first by John Munro of Fowlis, and afterwards by James Dunbar of Cumnock, as local chamberlain. It is said in the account of 1479 to have fallen to the crown, not by forfeiture but by resignation of John of Ilaa, Lord of the Isles, made personally in Parliament at Edinburgh before the three Estates of the realm.[1] The five divisions of the earldom are enumerated as Delne, Balkeny, Kynnardy, Fyrnenewer with Kessok, and Kynnellane; and the fermes of each are given in detail. The gross fermes for two years amount to £546, 13s. 4d., 93 chalders 4 bolls barley, 77 chalders 4 bolls oatmeal, 28 chalders oats, 5 score and 2 marts, and 98 sheep. Out of that sum the accountant is allowed for the fermes of the lands granted to Elizabeth Countess of Ross (she continues to be so designed), £122, 13s. 4d., 2 chalders barley, 2 chalders oatmeal, 1 chalder oats, 6 marts; and for the additional £100 accorded her she gets the rents of certain other lands in the earldom which, with the annuus redditus of the thanage of Caldor, amount in the two years to £96, 13s. 4d., 58 chalders barley, 42 chalders oatmeal, 6 chalders oats, 28 marts, and 28 sheep.

Two years later the Lord of the Isles was again in conflict with the Crown, a summons having been raised against him for various acts of treason, including the holding and garrisoning of the castle of Castlesone (Castle Swyn in Knapdale) against the King, and aid given to the rebels Donald Gorme and Neill M'Neill (Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 115). A payment occurs in the Bute account of 1478 for the expenses of John Scot, courier, in serving this summons.—Page 527.

Caldor or Cawdor, one of the most important of the old thanages, had been held of the Crown in the reign of Robert Bruce, when William Thane of Caldor got a charter to be held at feu-ferme for the same annual payment of twelve marks which had been in use to be made in the time of King Alexander III.[2] In the beginning of the fifteenth century, by a somewhat arbitrary stretch of power, the Earls of Ross were interposed over a large district of the north between the Crown and its vassals. The thanes of Caldor came in this way to hold of the Earls of Ross, and continued to do so till the forfeiture of 1475. Between the forfeiture of John of Isle and his restoration, namely on 28th May 1476, William Thane of Caldor resigned his lands, the thanage included, into the King's hands, and had them regranted on the following day.[1]

IV.

As James III. approached man's estate, he showed himself more and more deficient in the qualities required of a King of Scotland in that turbulent age. He devoted himself neither to manly exercises nor to affairs of State: architecture, music, and the then fashionable pursuit of astrology engrossed his attention to the neglect of public business; and his love for these studies unfortunately led him to make confidential friends of their professors.[2] On the other hand his two brothers, Alexander Duke of Albany and John Earl of Mar, the one three, the other six years his junior, were skilled in all martial and knightly accomplishments, and their society was courted by the barons from whom the King had withdrawn himself. The King's associates seem thereupon to have set themselves to prejudice his brothers in James's eyes; and their intrigues resulted in Albany being imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle, and Mar in Craigmillar. Albany, though perhaps at that time guiltless of any treasonable purposes against his brother, may be readily believed to have rendered himself amenable to the laws by irregularities committed in the exercise of his office of March Warden. The story of his nocturnal escape, resting as it does on the two independent narratives of Buchanan and Lindsay, is probably true. Having, with the aid of a faithful servant, intoxicated (and, according to Pitscottie, also stabbed) the captain of the guard, he descended by a rope from the castle battlements, his attendant preceding him. The latter having fallen and broken his thigh from the appliance for descent turning out too short, Albany, lengthening the cordage by attaching to it the sheets of his bed, effected the descent without misadventure, and, after removing his servant on his back to a place of safety, made his way to Leith, where a vessel was in waiting to take him to France.[1]

[2] Of physicians educated abroad and skilled in astrology, Archbishop Scheves has already been mentioned (v. supra, pages liv. et seq.). Another physician-astrologer whom James brought to Scotland was Dr Andreas, whose prediction of the death of the Duke of Burgundy is said to have gained him a high position among the devotees of the occult sciences, and who also, if Buchanan is to be believed, foretold to James the manner of his own death under the figure of a lion being strangled by its whelps. There is a payment of £10 "doctori Andree, phisico" in the Haddington customs' account of 1471 (page 124), and the Treasurers' Accounts show (pp. 48 and 69), that he received from James a gown worth £7, 4s., and that £16 was advanced by the King at Bruges to pay the expense of his "dispensacioun." In the period immediately succeeding the present volume one Master Michael Ker gets for several successive years an allowance of £20 to enable him to pursue the study of medicine in foreign parts (vol. ix., pages 69, 155, 214).

Dunbar Castle, which had been garrisoned for Albany, was besieged by Lord Avandale for the King, and taken after a siege which, according to Buchanan, lasted several months, the garrison at the last effecting their escape to England. The same historian tells us that several distinguished knights were slain, whom Lesly particularizes as "the laird of Luce, Sir John Schaw of Sauchy, knycht, and the laird of Cragywallace,[1] who met their death by one shot. Two allusions to this siege of Dunbar occur in the rolls. In the Fife account audited 16th July 1479, £3 are paid for the cutting and squaring of timber in the woods of Alloa and Clackmannan "pro certis necessariis contra castrum de Dunbar;"[2] and in the Edinburgh customs' account audited 28th June 1481, Thomas Turing is paid £4, 16s. for 32 lbs. of lead bought from him "tempore obsedionis castri de Dunbar."[3] The laird of Sauchy at that date was not "Sir John" but James Schaw, who had been Comptroller of the Household, and was then chamberlain of the Crown lands near Stirling; but he was assuredly not killed at this siege, as his name, prominent in the Exchequer accounts before scottie, with his usual confusion about the order of events, makes Albany first escape to England, and, after returning and being reconciled to the King, fall again under suspicion, then, escaping a second time in the way that has been described, make his way to France. Lesly, while putting Albany's escape in its right place in the order of events, makes him find his way to England and not to France.

this date, is equally so after it, and he renders the Stirlingshire accounts in 1479, 1480, 1481, and 1482, as in previous years, and figures in the history of the time at a still later date. The Exchequer accounts of 1480 corroborate Lesly as to the fact of Sir John Colquhoun's death at Dunbar,[1] and thus give us the material for fixing very nearly the date of that siege. Colquhoun's death must on the one hand have been subsequent to the 18th April 1479, inasmuch as he was at that date alive and in Edinburgh witnessing a Crown charter in favour of Lord Avandale.[2] On the other hand Dunbar must have been recovered before the 22nd May 1479, that being the date of the summons of treason

[2] Reg. Mag. Sig., l. ix. No. 21. The name of Sir John Colquhoun is of frequent occurrence in the rolls, in the various capacities of Sheriff of Dumbarton, keeper of Dumbarton Castle, custumar of Dumbarton, lessee of the island of Arran after the forfeiture of the Boyds, and Comptroller of the Household (in 1464 and 1465); as also in connection with the annuity paid to his wife, the daughter of James Dunbar Earl of Moray, widow of Archibald Douglas Earl of Moray, and divorced wife of George Master of Huntly; as to whom see Preface to volume vi. page cxxxiv. Crawfurd (Officers of State in Scotland, p. 319), whose mistake has been repeated by later writers, is in error in supposing that he was ever Great Chamberlain of Scotland, or that the designation "Camerarius Scotiæ" was given him when accredited as ambassador to England in 1474. The office which he then held was "familiaris cambellanus regis" (Reg. Mag. Sig., l. viii. No. 33, 17 Sep. 1477), or "uschar of our soveran Lordis chawmer durr" (Acta Dominorum Concilii, p. 49) loosely described as "camerarius" (not "Camerarius Scotiæ") in the credentials given by Edward IV. to the English ambassadors (Fœdera, xi. p. 814). At the time when Colquhoun is said to have been Great Chamberlain, that office was really held by the King's uncle, James Earl of Buchan (pages 395 and 398).

against Albany for holding it against the King.[1] While several persons implicated in this transaction were attainted at the Parliament of October following, we find the process against Albany and some of his accomplices continued by special command of the King from Parliament to Parliament during Albany's absence in France and England, the last recorded adjournment being till February 1481–2, after which we hear no more of it.[2]

The arrest of the King's youngest brother seems to have been the immediate result of his plain-speaking with regard to the King's choice of advisers; but the royal favourites further suggested that he had, in league with certain persons who suffered death for sorcery, practised magical arts against the King's life. The historians of the succeeding generation assert that, after some sort of irregular trial by James's domestic council, he was bled to death by the King's order in a bath. Drummond of Hawthornden however, on the strength of Bishop Elphinstone's contemporary testimony, attributes his death to misadventure and not deliberate intent. According to his account a violent fever, brought on by the irksomeness of restraint to a man of excitable temper, occasioned the removal of the Prince from Craigmillar Castle to the Canongate, where the King's physician, who attended him, resorted to the then usual remedy of bleeding; but the bandages having become loosened, either by the patient's act in his delirium or by the negligence of his attendants, he died from loss of blood.[1]

The death of the Earl of Mar is dated 1479 in a meagre but valuable chronicle of Scottish history from the earliest period down to 1482, appended to the Royal MS. of Wyntoun in the British Museum, the most important portion of which has been printed by Pinkerton.[2] On the other hand Ferrerius and Lesly assert that he was arrested by night in December 1480,[3] a statement which would carry more weight were both these writers not widely wrong as to the date of Albany's apprehension and escape. Buchanan makes Mar's arrest immediately precede Albany's.[4] It must have been subsequent to the Parliament which met in March 1478–9, as Mar was present there,[5] but may have preceded the following one, held in October 1479, in the records of which his name does not appear.[6]

APPENDIX TO PREFACE.

NO. I.

THE EARLS OF ORKNEY.

The chief historical difficulties connected with the succession and marriages of the several Earls of Strathern who in turn bore the name of Malise—the last of whom was also Earl of Orkney and of Caithness,—have been grappled with by Mr Skene in a very able paper in the Transactions of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, xii. p. 571, reprinted in "Celtic Scotland," iii. p. 448. One of the results at which he arrives is that the last (according to his view the fourth) Earl Malise must have inherited Orkney and Caithness through his mother Mary, widow of Sir Hugh of Abernethy, as senior co-heiress of Earl Magnus of the Angus line, that lady's exact paternity however remaining matter of uncertainty.

But there is still an apparent conflict of evidence about the way in which the Sinclairs inherited the earldom of Orkney. The currently accepted genealogy rests in part on a Latin diploma of the descent of Earl William, a document of which the original is not known to exist, but which has been preserved to us through a copy at Panmure House, and a translation made by Thomas Gulde, a monk of Newbottle, in 1554. It was first printed in the Rev. James Wallace's "Account of the Orkney Islands" in 1700; and has since been reprinted in the "Orkneyinga Saga" (ed. 1780), in Barry's "History of Orkney," and in the "Miscellany of the Maitland Club," iii. p. 65, where the text of the Panmure MS. is placed in juxtaposition with the translation. It has further been carefully edited by Professor Munch in his "Symbola ad Historiam Antiquiorem rerum Norvegicarum" (Christiania, 1850). That this diploma was not, as has been asserted, the warrant for the official admission by King Eric of Sir William Sinclair's claim to the earldom in 1434, appears from its mention of "quondam recolende memorie Erici vestri predecessoris regis nostri . . . literas patentes." The mention of Thomas (Tulloch) as Bishop of Orkney, and of Eric as no longer alive, fix the date of the document as 1460, or the year before or after, inasmuch as King Eric, who was deposed in 1442, survived till 1459, and Thomas' successor in the see, William Tulloch, was Bishop of Orkney on 28th June 1461[1]. From the condition of both the transcript and the translation, it would appear that the date appended to the original had been illegible or obliterated. In the Panmure MS. it is 1043, corrected to 1403; in the translation it is 1406, corrected to 1446. The instrument bears to be an attestation of the pedigree of the Earls of Orkney issued by Thomas Bishop of Orkney, the chapter, lawman, and others, the result of an investigation made at the instance of Earl William, to facilitate which letters patent had been obtained from the deceased King Eric.

When confronted with the results of critical research on the same subject, this diploma pedigree, if not free from error,[2] is in its more important statements tolerably accurate. And its averments regarding the Sinclair Earls,

[1] Diplomatarium Norvegicum, v. p. 605.

[2] The statement most open to question in it, that the first wife of Earl Malise of Strathern, Caithness, and Orkney, was daughter of the Earl of Menteith, is apparently a confused apprehension of the fact that his step-mother was a daughter of Sir John Menteith. At the same time the paternity of the Earl's first wife is, as has been observed, unknown: she was apparently the Countess of Strathern involved in the Soulis conspiracy of 1320.

including the assertions of the marriage of Sir William Sinclair with the Strathern heiress, and of his son Henry (who obtained investiture in 1379) with Janet Haliburton, relate to events so little remote that they can hardly fail to have been matters of notoriety. As little reason can there be to doubt the circumstantial narrative how, after Earl Henry's death, his mother, the daughter of Earl Malise, came to reside in Orkney, where she survived all her sons and daughters, and her sisters and their children, and was alive at a great age in the memory of the then living generation, who had seen her and talked with her.

The only ground for calling the later portion of this genealogy in question is its discrepancy from a still earlier Orkney document, also known through a copy at Panmure House, and printed in the "Spalding Miscellany," v. p. 257, namely, an attestation by the lawman and canons of Orkney and certain burgesses of Kirkwall, of date 10th November 1422, regarding a certain James of Cragy "dominus de Hupe," and his wife Margaret. Cragy is there certified to be a subject of the King of Norway of legitimate birth and good conversation, and his wife to be lawful daughter of Elizabeth (then used interchangeably with Isabel), daughter of the late Malise Earl of Strathern and Orkney. The terms of the document seem to indicate that this Elizabeth was still alive. If so, she must have been about ninety years of age, or perhaps older, as in 1334 her uncle William Earl of Ross got her marriage from her father;[1] and this incidental concurrence with the later diploma furnishes strong evidence of the authenticity of both. But there is also a remarkable point of discrepancy. Elizabeth's husband and the father of Margaret is declared to be not Sir William Sinclair, but Sir Henry Sinclair, Earl of Orkney. If this were so, Earl Henry would have derived the right which was acknowledged in 1379, not from his mother, but from his wife. Chronological considerations however show that the husband of Malise's daughter must have been William, not Henry. As Isabel of Strathern was alive in 1334, she was contemporary not of Henry but of his father, who could have been little her senior. The charter of 23rd April 1391 by Henry Earl of Orkney to his brother David, making mention of their claim to lands in Shetland through their mother Isabel,[1] is also conclusive, if the granter was that Earl Henry; and it seems impossible that it could have been his son, who had not yet arrived at man's estate. The solution of the genealogical crux seems to be that "Henrici" is a clerical slip (probably of the transcriber) for "Willelmi."

A further difficulty no doubt arises if it be assumed, as is done in the ordinary pedigrees, that another Margaret Sinclair, who had a dispensation in 1353 to marry Thomas Stewart Earl of Angus,[2] was also a daughter of the marriage of Sir William Sinclair and Isabel of Strathern. But any child of that marriage must have been in infancy in 1353; and the probability is that this lady has been misplaced by a generation in the accepted accounts of the Sinclair family, and was sister, not daughter, of Sir William.
